What to do with your terms and conditions

This page is for your information only; separate it from the other pages

The usual ways of trying to get the user to accept the website terms of use are:

- A checkbox that they need to click on to accept the terms of use (click wrap), or
- By bringing the terms to the attention of the user and stating that by continuing to browse or use the site, they are accepting and agreeing to be bound by the terms (browse wrap).

This document uses the browse wrap method. However, the chances of binding the user to the terms are increased with the click wrap method.

If it is possible and practical, try to design your website so that the terms are brought to the attention of the user (e.g. by a banner or a pop-up box containing a clickable link to the terms), who is then asked to click to acknowledge that they accept the terms of use. This design would mean that the user would be more likely to be bound by the terms.

You should provide a prominent link to these terms and conditions of use from your homepage and any other page on the site to which they might be relevant. You should provide them in a format that allows the user to download or print a copy to keep for future reference.
